latter quarter of that century, a southern part of the Yscanis seem to have been merged. These southern Yscanis may have been the "Hiscas", or "Halscas", mentioned in the royal edicts of 1748 and 1752 relating to missions in central Texas, cited by Professor Bolton in the *Handbook of American Indians."

See, of same, the articles "Waco" and "Yscanis"; and for northern Waco and Yscanis, see the "Honechahs" (apparently a misprint for "Honechahs", cf. Baehr) and "Ascanis" in La Harpe's Journal of 1719.

At Guasco, the natives were found possessed of "some turquoise, and shawls of cotton;" and in the same or some other southwestward province of the Cadan region, the Spaniards of Moscoso's party "observed wooden crosses placed on the tops of the houses, and were struck with the sight of this Christian emblem. They began to flatter themselves that they were approaching the confines of New Spain, and made incessant inquiries, in every province that they entered, whether the inhabitants knew anything of Christian people to the west."

From Guasco, the army—pursuing reports of "Christians"—made marches to the villages of Naquisaca and Nagacahoe, whose exact location we can only conjecture. According to Lewis (who puts Guasco in the vicinity of Fort Belknap), they were to the southeast of Guasco. By some authors, they have been identified with Nacogdoches and Natchitoches; but the distance apart of these two latter places, if at their eighteenth century localities, is not consistent with the 27 miles, or thereabout, implied by the "two days" march between the two former places, which is mentioned by the Gentleman of Elvas; to say nothing of the fact that Nacogdoches and Natchitoches appear too far east to be considered in the present connection, i.e., as having been visited from Guasco in a mere side-trip of the march from Guachoya to the River Dayco, as related by the Gentleman of Elvas. * The last-mentioned consideration.

*It is of course quite possible that the geographical position of the Nacogdoches and Natchitoches may have changed in the century and a half that intervened between the expedition of Moscoso and that of the French discoverers of these nations; but, if they did, it is, on general grounds, likely that the movement was westward, rather than eastward. As will appear farther on, the possibility of their identity with Naquisaca and Nagacahoe would seem greater if we might assume that the two latter settlements were visited from Guasco on the return journey, and that the statement of their having been visited as a side-trip thence in the outward-bound course of the expedition, was due to a slip of memory on the part of the narrator. That the Nacogdoches lived in the region of the Aduas, in the sixteenth century as well as in the better-known eighteenth, seems probable; for in 1534 and '35 Cabeza de Vaca traveled among the tribes of interior east Texas, and among these he names, as successive in geographical position, the "Acubadaes", or "Decubadaes", (equivalent to Nacubadachos), and the "Atayos", who seem to have been identical respectively with the Nacogdoches and the Aduas. Their proximity to the Nacodaches is less certain, but the latter seems to have been in or near northeastern Texas at that time, and to have been the Indians whom Cabeza de Vaca called "Arbadaes" (equivalent to Nacodaches); but their position relative to other interior tribes, he did not state.

For the possible position of the main village and province of the Nacodaches at this time, see "Naguateas."

Is likewise an objection to the identification of the Nacacahoz of that gentleman's narrative, with the "Masahossez" of the 1718 edition of the map of Delisle, which appears in the Four Nations group on Red River, and is synonymous with the "Matschos" of Joutel's Relation of 1687, (page 409,) and the "Matscoes" of La Harpe's Journal of 1719.

River Daycan. Having traced up the rumors of "Christians" in the region of Naquiscoza and Nagacahoz, they found them to be untrue; "and so it was deemed of everything else the Indians had told of having seen Christians in Florida"; and Mosco returned to Guasco, where the "residents stated, that ten days' journey from there, toward the sunset, was a river called Daycan, whither they sometimes went to drive and kill deer, and whence they had seen persons on the other bank, but without knowing what people they were. The Christians took as much maize as they could find, to carry with them; and journeying ten days through a wilderness, they arrived at the river of which the Indians had spoken. Ten horsemen sent in advance by the governor had crossed; and, following a road leading up from the bank, they came upon an encampment of Indians living in very small huts, who, directly as they saw the Christians, took to flight, leaving what they had, indications only of poverty and misery. So wretched was the country, that what was found everywhere, put together, was not half an alqueire of maize. Taking two natives, they went back to the river, where the Governor waited; and on coming to question the captives, to ascertain what towns there might be to the west, no Indian was found in the camp who knew their language. They considered the country farther on, beyond the River Daycao, on which they were, to be that which Cabeza de Vaca had said in his narrative should have to be traversed, where the Indians wandered like Arabs, having no settled place of residence, living on prickly pears, the roots of plants, and game; and that if this should be so, and they, entering upon that tract, found no provision for sustenance during winter, they must inevitably perish, it being already the beginning of October*.

*Narrative by the Gentleman of Elvas, loc. cit., pp. 245-5.

Ten days' westward march from present Waco, Texas, would have taken Moscoso and his army to the Colorado River, which is probably therefore the River Daycao, and was probably reached not many miles west of Pecan Bayou, or about south of Brownwood. There, according to Roessler's Map of Texas, is a timbered sandstone region, in which is a small left-hand tributary of the Colorado, called "Deer Creek." According to various maps, there are in this region of the Colorado River and its tributaries, several streams called "Deer Creek." The inhabitants of Guasco may well, therefore, have come to this river for hunting deer. In connection with this river's ancient Caddoan name, Daycao, it is perhaps significant that the Caddo name for deer, as given in Gallatin's Vocabularies, is dah*.

Synopsis of the Indian Tribes....., By the Hon. Albert Gallatin; Transac. and Coll. American Antiquarian Society, 1836, page 340. This is strongly advised. interior and eastern parts of the Llano Estacado; and from the same and Jaramillo's narrative and the Relacion del Suceso, we know that the most southeasterly of these Querécho villages was a large one in a great ravine like those of Colima; and that, at a day's

"In 1719, according to La Harpe, the wandering Nations west of or near the Upper Cross Timbers on Red River, learned that these nations [apparently all Caddoan] had just returned from a successful fight with the "Cancy," and that the Cancy had had a strongly peopled village on the banks of the Red River, at 60 leagues from the place in which the Stewu Rivery found himself." (Margry, Orig. Fr., VI, 277.) And Beauretin (as cited L.C., p. 277) informs us that the Cancy nation was one of eleven villages situated toward the source of Red River, in whose vicinity the Spaniards have some establishments; and again (L.C., page 279) refers to them as "Les Canney, one of whose principal villages is that of the Quiríres..." This Quiríre village was evidently a Querécho stronghold, and the same as that which Du Rivage had been told was 60 leagues west of the Wandering Nations; but its situation seems to have been somewhat more northerly than that which Coronado found, in the ravine like those of Colima."

... journey (south?) from this ravine and village, was "discovered another ravine", a league wide, "with a little bit of a river at the bottom", "in the midst of good meadows", where Coronado established the camp in which he divided his army, sending the larger part of it back to Tiguex, and himself proceeding north with a picked force in quest of Quivira; and that 4 days' journey (presumably southeastward) from the same Querécho village (and now finally, it would seem, southeast of the Llano), an exploring party sent out by Coronado found a 40- or 50-mile tract or settlement, whose villages—perhaps from their having been built on level spaces—resembled "threshing floors", of which, or possibly all collectively, bore the name "Cuna."*

"Compare the "Comes" of Cabeza de Vaca's narrative.

"Hodges" of Castaneda informs us that the people of the Cuna settlement were called "Toyas", whom, with good reason, Mr. Hodge believes were some of the "Texas" or "Tojas" of other writers; that is, some of the allied nations of the Caddoan linguistic family. They were enemies of the Queréchos. It is clear that the Toyas of the Cuna tract differed in mode of life from the more easterly Toyas, and were buffalo-hunting, roaming over the Llano Estacado, and having the Cuna district as a place of residence when not following the buffalo; for we are told that, like the Querechos, "They have no other settlement location except the Llano itself, must have been meant] than comes from traveling around with the cattle," and that in traveling they made use of the troops of pack-dogs, and that the Indians of the region visited by Coronado did not raise corn nor gourds, nor make pottery. The Conas differed from the Tonkawas (one of the later-known Wandering Nations) and from many other Caddoan tribes in not eating human flesh; but their Caddoan affinity is indicated by Castañeda, who states that "The people of Quivira, [who were of the Caddoan family] are of almost the same sort and appearance as the Teyas" [who had been met at Cona].

If on the Rio Colorado, this Cuna settlement, were lower end, may have been nearly a hundred miles southeast of the most southeasterly village of the Querechos, must have been higher up than where Moscoso reached that river.

The people found by Moscoso's scouts west of the Colorado, could not have been Teyas, as they did not understand any of the Caddoan dialects spoken by the Indians whom Moscoso had brought with him; and it seems therefore virtually certain that they were Querechos, or Apaches.

Beyond the valley of the Mississippi, Moscoso's army would indeed have entered upon a dry and inhospitable region, where their fears that, if they undertook to cross that tract, they would perish, might easily have been realized.

Moscoso having called together the captains and principal men, and it having been determined by the majority that they should return to the Mississippi (Rio Grande de Guachoya), build brigantines, and with these endeavor to go down the river to the coast and thence by sea to New Spain, the return journey was begun; though not without much disappointment and murmuring on the part of some whose pride rebelled against returning to New Spain in poverty, and who believed that the turquoises and cotton shawls which had been seen in Guasco, and which were alleged to have come "from the direction of the sunset," indicated that they might find the land of "gold, silver, and stones of much value" through which Cabeza de Vaca had passed, about seven years before, in his westward journey, "after seeing cotton cloth," and that westward was the direction in which by perseverance, they might find those riches as well as, finally, "the country of Christians."

"From Cayaco, where they were, to the Rio Grande [de Guachoya], was a distance of one hundred and fifty leagues, which they had marched, toward that place, always westwardly; and, as they returned over the way, with great difficulty could they find maize to eat; for, whereas they had passed, the country lay devastated, and the little that was left, the Indians had now hidden."

"Gentleman of Elvas, loc. cit., p. 217.

From the above, it might be inferred that the return journey was both a line due eastward, and the same route over which they had come to the River Mayaca; but in fact it was neither. Some additional light on the return route is shed by Mr. Irving, who in his "Conquest of Florida," made use not only of the narrative of the Gentleman of Elvas, but also of that of Garcilasso de la Vega, entitled "Florida del INCA;" appears to have more to say of the return journey through present Texas. Almost, in silence, lacking the "Florida," I hope to copiously from the "Conquest."

The Spaniards had now a long and weary march before them, with no novelty ahead to cheer them on, and a country to traverse, the savage inhabitants of which had been rendered hostile by their previous invasion, and its resources laid waste by their foraging parties. They endeavored to remedy those disadvantages as much as possible by making a bend to the south, so as to avoid the desolate tracts they had recently traversed, and to find regions more abundant in provisions."

From this, it would appear that the return route passed somewhat to the south of Guasco, and continued westward instead of returning directly northward to Rio Sivio, from which near that province, the province of Los Vaqueros, which seems to have included all of the country soon by them west of the Lower Cross Timbers and Guasco, and which was in later years known as the range of the Wandering Nations, the Spaniards "journeyed by forced marches, and took every precaution not to provoke the Indians; the latter, however, were on the alert, and harassed them at all hours of day and night. Sometimes they concealed themselves in woods, by which the Spaniards had to pass; in the more open country they would lie upon the ground, covered by the tall grass and woods, and as the soldiers, seeing no enemy, came carelessly along, the wily savages would suddenly spring up, discharge a shower of arrows, and immediately take to flight.

"These assaults were so many and frequent, that one band would scarcely be repulsed from the vanguard, when another attacked the rear, and frequently the line of march was assailed in three or four places at the same time, with great loss and injury both of men and horses. In fact, it was in this province of Los Vaqueros that the Spaniards, without coming hand to hand with the enemy, received more injury than in any other through which they passed. This was especially the case in the course of the last day’s march, when their route was extremely rough, through woods, and across streams and ravines, and other dangerous passes, peculiarly fit for ambush and surprise. Here the savages, who were well acquainted with the ground, had them at their mercy, waylaying them at every step, wounding Spaniards, and horses, and the Indian servants who accompanied the army.

"The last of these assaults happened just before arriving at the place of encampment, as they crossed a brook overhung with trees and thickets. Just as one of the horsemen, named Sanjurgo, was in the middle of the brook, an arrow shot from among the bushes on the bank, struck him in the rear, pierced his cuirass of mail, passed through the muscle of his right thigh, then through the saddle tree and padd-dings, and buried itself in the horse. The wounded animal sprang out of the brook, sallied forth upon the plain, and went on plunging and kicking to get clear of the arrow and his rider.

"The comrades of Sanjurgo hastened to his assistance. Finding him nearly, in a manner, to the saddle, and the army having halted to encamp hard by, they led him on horseback as he was, to his allotted quarters.
Lifting him gently from his seat, they cut off the shaft of the arrow, between the saddle and the wound; after which, taking off the saddle, they found that the injury to the horse was but slight. What surprised them, however, was, that the shaft, which had penetrated through so many substances, was a mere reed, with the end hardened in the fire.
Such was the vigour of arm with which those Indian archers plied their bows.

"This Sanjurgo had enjoyed a kind of charlatan reputation among the soldiers, for curing wounds with oil, wool, and certain words, which he called a charm. At the battle of Mauvila, however, all the oil and wool had been burnt, and Sanjurgo’s miraculous cures were at an end. His whole surgical skill being confined to his nostrum and charm, he was now fain to call in the aid of the surgeon to extract the head of an arrow which was lodged in his knee. The operation was so painful, however, that he railed at the surgeon for a bungler, and swore he would rather die than come again under his hands, and the latter replied that he might die and welcome, before he would have anything to do with him again.

"In his present wounded state, therefore, Sanjurgo was in a sad dilemma, having no nostrums of his own, and being precluded from the assist-and of the surgeon. At length he thought of a substitute for his old remedy, and making use of hog's lard, instead of oil, and the shred of an Indian mantle, instead of wool, he dressed his wound with them, and pronounced his vaunted charm. Faith and a good constitution work miracles in quackery. In the course of four days that the army remained encamped to attend to the sick, Sanjurgo had so far recovered as to resume his saddle, galloping up and down in vaunting style among the soldiery, whose faith in his nostrum and his charm became stronger than ever.*

"Garcilaso de la Vega, part 2, lib. 5, c. 5."

"After leaving the disastrous province of Los Vaqueros, the Spaniards continued for twenty days, by forced marches, through other lands, of which they did not know the name, taking but little pains to gain information, their only object being to get to the Mississippi. Although they avoided all pitched battles with the natives, they continued to be harassed by them incessantly. Did a soldier chance to wander a short distance from his comrades, he was instantly shot down. In this manner, no less than forty Spaniards were picked off by lurking foes. By night the Indians would enter the camp on all fours, or drawing themselves along like snakes, without being heard, and thus shoot down horses, and even sentinels who were off their guard.

"One day, when the army was about to march, Francisco, the Geneoese carpenter, obtained permission of the Governor for himself and several troopers, who were in want of servants, to remain behind, and lie in ambush at the place of their encampment, for the Indians were accustomed to visit those places as soon as the Spaniards had abandoned them, to pick up any articles they might have left behind.

"A dozen horse and twelve foot concealed themselves, accordingly, in a thick clump of trees, one of their companions climbing to the top of the highest to look out and give notice should an Indians approach. In four sallies they captured fourteen of the enemy without any resistance. Those they divided among them, two falling to the share of Francisco, the shipwright, as leader of the detachment. The party would rejoined the army, but Francisco refused, alleging that he needed another Indian, and that he would not return until he had captured one.

"All efforts of his comrades to shake this foolhardy determination were in vain; each of them offered to give up the Indian that had fallen to his share, but he refused to accept the boon. Yielding, therefore, to his obstinacy, they remained with him in ambush."